Synopsis (Not for Publication)

Kate Lennox preaches an insincere doctrine of woman's "freedom" from the obligations of domesticity, or even fidelity. Ruth, pretty young sister of Kate's husband, Harry Lennox, lives with them and takes Kate's radical views seriously.

Lonnie Winston loves Ruth boyishly and sincerely. Barbara Farley secretly loves Harry Lennox. Ned Hollister, an adventurer, pays court to Kate as a blind for his dishonorable intentions toward little Ruth. He is selling Kate a very expensive automobile, which she buys without consulting Harry. A quarrel results and Harry leaves the house. Ned comes and takes the two girls to town for dinner and a dance. Harry, who has changed his mind and come back, sees them go.

Ned pleads with Ruth to "elope" with him, and she agrees, using Kate's theories as justification. Lonnie and Harry overtake the pair at a mountain hotel, and Lonnie almost kills Ned in a fight. Ruth, who has learned that Ned is married and a defaulter, has slipped away. Under arrest, Ned tells the police that Ruth threatened to kill herself. They search the forest and drag the lake without result.

Harry and Kate are estranged by Ruth's loss. Grayson orders Harry to India. Lonnie is to go also, and Barbara, wishing to be taken with Harry, intimates to Kate that Harry wants a divorce. Kate, heartbroken, prepares to give him one and sell the house.

Just before Harry and Lonnie are to leave, Ruth returns. Weak, ill and beaten, she bitterly upbraids Kate, but her very eagerness to make amends wins over the girl. Harry comes to ask what Kate meant by her note about a divorce, and is reunited with his wife and his sister. Lonnie, learning that Ruth can still honorably be his wife, takes her back into his heart.
